

At the end of the lesson, the student will be able to:

- * to make certain decisions about the realities of life.
- * to bring about the consequences of their decisions.

Read

What would you do if your wife refused to live with your parents?.

First, I would give her many reasons why all of us living together makes sense. For example, I would tell her my parents would be around all the time to help look after our children and household chores, and that they have lived through many things and would be able to give us good advice to avoid some of their problems. On the other hand, they are getting older and weaker, and more lonely, and that we have a moral responsibility to support them. But if she still rejected my reasons, I would let her live alone with our children, and would live with my parents myself. I can't live them alone; they need someone to take care of them. After all, they sacrificed everything to bring me up, and now it's my turn to help them.

What would you do?

1. If your husband came home drunk every night?
2. If your children fell behind in their schoolwork?
3. If you saw someone with a flat tire on the road?
4. If you saw bucks fall from someone's bag?
5. If your child got a black eye from a classmate?
6. If you got too much change back at a store?
7. If you failed to get promoted twice?
8. If you were falling in line and an old woman cut in?
9. If your sweetheart wanted to break up with you?
10. If the doctor told you that you had an incurable disease?
11. If your spouse snored a lot at night?
12. If you and your best friend both loved the same person?
13. If you knew that Doomsday would come next year?